

November 7th, 2025

Since our last writing on October 14th we've seen quite a dramatic few weeks as anticipated earnings are reported and reacted upon, government shutdowns heighten amid cascading unemployment, and investors grapple with the looming December rate decision. This is the bumpy earnings road the market is traveling on. Although we've made mention of this expected turbulence in prior writeups, there is always the innate animal ability to experience emotion. With some of our mentions moving at times more than 30% in a day, I've caught myself on the emotional side of things. You can only be human and in the investing world that comes with the anchor of emotion.

Following up on our 10/14 thoughts...

Nothing has changed for me as far as my allocation to cash and the aggressiveness I've taken since our last write up. As of today, I'm in a cash position of ~45%. Typically, I always have a cash position above 20% as it allows me to be opportunistic. In short, I plan to make use of this cash position in the coming days to weeks.

"As of today, I'm not as aggressively positioned as I plan to be in a month's time. I'd like to see a little surety in earnings before I get fully positioned for year end."

- I was as happy as anyone in October 2024 when RDDT turned into a goliath. I was ecstatic to sell for $150/share, that of which was acquired around $50/share in mid-2024. I was quickly proven a fool as the stock appreciated to over $225/share. Luckily, this is a young name that provides ample opportunities and I was able to re-add again in 2025 for around $85/share. From the April 2025 tariff bottom, this name returned over 300%. I'm currently watching it very closely in hopes it can get to the gap around $160-170/share. At that point I would be aggressively adding. Do I think it reaches that? Likely not, as this name garners a lot of attention and it is a very powerful company that has seen tremendous amounts of institutional money flow into it over the last 12 months. I'm okay with anyone nibbling at it <$200/share.
 - While it is more volatile than mature big caps, RDDT continues to be a top stock. During this week's selloff I began nibbling at RDDT shares below $190/share all the way to $178/share. I'll comment here that during this red tape week RDDT showed resiliency that cannot go unacknowledged. I continue to believe in this name and expect it to continue being a major winner for investors.
- In today's market environment I'd be remiss not to mention a few names that I'm actively trading that are seeing tremendous price action. In no particular hierarchy, RR, BZAI, and SLNH. Now you've read my recent actions around RR, but the other two I've yet to mention in these writeups. I'll note here these are names I've pegged as trading extremely strong and I do not intend on holding any of these in long term accounts for now. Not to mention, they are thematically set up perfectly. During October I'll be looking to add to my current positions should there be an opportunity. I'd be okay with adding SLNH below $2.50 per share and BZAI below $5 per share.

As for RR, I made note of this name several times recently and at its current price ($6.50), I'm not recommending you go out and buy this name. I was directing that at $2.80 per share. Ultimately, there is a lot of rerating potential here between these names and I'm expecting to profit from it handsomely.

- These three names have been my playground recently. I do not recommend you try to trade these if you are not experienced nor know what you are doing. Simply put, you've got to execute here on your entry point. The good news is this market is providing tons of volatility. I've readjusted a few entry points on these names around some company specific events.
 - BZAI: This again is a thematically perfect set up, but we've got to be protective with our average cost. With earnings coming up on 11/13 and a company presentation taking place on 11/11, I'm currently watching to reenter at or below $3/share. I'm fine watching and starting to add in small batches as close to $3/share as possible. Technically speaking this is an ideal "Stage 2" stock.
 - SLNH: I think my next entry here will be at or below $2.75/share. We have earnings on 11/13. I'm not going to risk much prior to that. I suggest you just watch this name for a few days and you'll see the animal you're dealing with. This is a name that moves +/-20% in a day. For example, this week it had a 20% positive mid-week move followed by a -13% Friday.
 - RR: This is one I've got pegged as a valuation problem currently. I would not be buying this name where it currently trades ($4/share) and I expect it to get back below $3/share fairly soon. I'm watching here and nothing else.
- With the last few weeks being what they've been, I can't help but mention a darling of mine EOSE. This is a name I've pounded the drum on from $3.50 per share onwards. We discussed its "Stage 2" breakout back in the summer. Since then, it has been nothing short of a firework and ironically enough I've only grown more confident. If you've read these for a few years, you'll remember a name, BE, that I mentioned back in the summer of 2024. Take 10 seconds to review Bloom Energy (BE) and you'll see a similar potential offering here in EOSE. I'll add aggressively to EOSE should we see a pullback. I see this name continuing its manic run into the year end as the company's potential is rerated. I will not be shocked to see a 3 or 4 in front of this name soon.
 - By now, this is a name that is starting to get recognition from retailers. Having said that, its run up YTD is nothing to take lightly. The ER call on 11/5 was fantastic and highlighted everything you could want to hear. Even during this week's selloff EOSE has managed to be a safe haven for investors. The price action during Friday's session was remarkably strong, another sign you just can't ignore. I love to put myself through that exercise of where is the smart money hiding amid red tape weeks? My average here is around $9.20/share from averaging up throughout Q2/Q3, and I will not hesitate to add more should we see a drop below $13/share.
- Lastly, I want to mention a new name here in ACHR. I've recently started a position in this name at $11.75 per share. I think there is downside support at $11.40 and again at $10 per share range. I'll add should we see that. For now, this is a slower hold for me and I expect it to run hard sometime before year end as the AI carry trade continues into every nook and cranny in the market.

- The key word mentioned above is slower, as this is one that I've played from the angle of sympathy. Essentially a sympathy trade on a name related to Palantir and Anduril Industries. I enjoy the company and the founder who owns roughly ~7% of the company. Currently trading at $8/share, one could start a position here. I'll continue to watch closely and possibly add a little to this name. For now, it's a very small position as my main focus is on a few other names I'm more familiar with.

Looking ahead...

During this period big tech earnings have caused a few selloffs from notable leaders (PLTR, META) as results didn't amount to perfection. Outside of the April tariff saga, 2025 has been an environment where most of our leaders have been priced for perfection. It's felt like almost everyday there is another partnership or CAPEX pledge being announced in the name of AI spending. While this spending could be virtuous, it's tough to grapple with considering the players at hand. At times it has felt like the goliaths of our stock market have been patting each other on the back, resulting in >$100B market cap moves in a given day. To me, we are seeing NVDA spread its chips across the roulette table as they are experiencing unfathomable tailwinds. From healthcare (NVO) to telecom (CSCO) to good ole infrastructure (ORCL), NVDA has seemingly partnered with every facet of the AI industry. It does not hurt them to announce a partnership with anyone and everyone. With their next earnings coming up on November 19th, the market seems to be at a level of anticipation I've rarely experienced personally. Here is where common sense comes into play... with NVDA currently trading above a $5 trillion dollar market cap and almost ~8% of the entire market (AI sector now accounts for over ~30% of the entire market), it is in unprecedented territory, some would say bubbly. What happens when everyone has had enough chips? Simply put, you'll be exposed to a significant market drop at that period. It is not really a guessing game either, it is math at that point.

We discussed the expected October earnings volatility weeks ago and in totality the month of October was exceptional for the market. Seasonally, we are not in a period where one would expect to experience a ~10% correction. Barring a NVDA peak in earnings on November 19th, I can only surmise a ~3-5% pullback in which the market reclaims it by year end. That is why, to me, the leading sword in this fight is NVDA's growth rate and when it begins to crack. It is the only way I can envision a substantial market decline occurring before year end. I'll add that the government shutdown news could be announced at any time and create a shift in market sentiment that puts us back into go mode. This train of thought has helped me recently and will continue to do so moving forward as we aim to get more aggressive.

Moving into select tickers...

A few of the trades (BZAI, SLNH, RDDT) we mentioned on 10/14 experienced rapid share appreciation (>20-40%) in a matter of days. These were trades and were suspected but certainly not in the manner they arrived. As odd as this sounds, it is always tough to be in a trade and it quickly become a big winner. At that point, I often make the mistake of not paying enough credit to the greatest investor ever,

Mr. Luck. That week I also strayed from a golden rule of mine when it comes to trading accounts, and that is when I experience an all time high, it is best to realize it. That simple action allows me to reevaluate where my head is amid the newfound emotions and to recalibrate for the next summit. Luckily, these names provide so much volatility that you are blessed to be able to trade them multiple times. Below I'll highlight a few of the tickers I'm giving the most attention to currently.

- A new face I'll mention is RBRK, a cybersecurity and data management company I've been watching the last month. I initiated a position at $71/share. Although it's below its long term moving averages, I don't care as I have time here and I believe this is a superior company within the cybersecurity space. The ownership structure is what I love for a long-term hold as well, with insiders accounting for almost 20% of total ownership. I would not be surprised to see this name turn into a rocket.
- Give me more opportunities to buy CRK below $18/share and I just might become a Cowboys fan. We made note of our entry on the 9/25 memo with an average price of $15.50/share. We've remarked on this name several times and it continues to give us the opportunity to make profits. Not to mention, this name is an umbrella for investors, finishing the week up over ~23% while the S&P is down 2-3%. Should we see the $18s again I'll most likely add more.
- I'll bore you with mentioning it again but RDDT is my #1 focus currently. Take from that what you will.
- We talked about putting EBAY on your radar during the 9/25 memo. They reported earnings this week and the stock price dropped from $99 to $81. This is another name I've seen so much strength out for 20+ months that I can only pay it respect. I'm not currently in this position but I do not mind starting one here at $82/share.
- We've mentioned FTNT several times through the years and this week we were again given an overreaction to earnings that resulted in a dramatic drop in the stock price, falling back to $75/share. I maintain this is a wonderful long term company for a tax advantaged account. One can also trade the earnings over reaction in the short term.
- My darling TEM saw quite the haircut after reporting earnings and further extrapolated due to the overall market. In short, the earnings were fantastic and I continue to believe in this company. I'm looking to add aggressively to this name around $62/share. A volatile name that I've written about extensively all year.
- UBER reported yet another great quarter of earnings and is surely being dragged down by the overall market. I added shares at $90/share this week. I continue to mark this as a strong long term hold and one that shows strength unlike the majority.

In conclusion, there are tons of quality names that I'm interested in during this pullback and the biggest idea on my mind is getting a feel for when this market is going to stop this choppy period and get back on its horse. I believe the current choppiness is due to the anticipation in NVDA's upcoming earnings and if it confirms our continued ascent on the AI bubble. As we mentioned earlier, our largest position is greenbacks and we intend on changing that soon.
