I'm going to use this to discuss where my head is at on a few active trades/investments that we are in and have written about this year extensively.

UNH - This is a name I've followed closely since the spring and boy has it had a rough time this year, -31% YTD. Luckily for us, we were only taking notes as the FCF behemoth got chopped in half during Q2. At that point it became what I consider to be a "Dislocated High Quality" stock. All things considered, it was and still is a blue chip quality company that experienced extreme micro headwinds. Things don't have to be complicated to invest profitably, and we surely don't have to run DCF models to know that this stock was extremely oversold. Hell it's still extremely oversold!

I entered UNH for the first time on 7/15 around $290/share. I felt there was great support in that price range and it quickly turned out that was not the case. Again, I repeat that this is not a complex trade idea. I was not fully allocated at that time and I made plans to add more should we see another push lower. In a matter of days we were crossing below $250/share and I was ready to add more. On August 4th I added more to my position in UNH around $245/share. I've included a snippet from my previous writings on August 4th. In the below image you'll see my purchases circled in yellow. This is not easy for most people and it is something I struggle with even on my best trade ideas. Planning ahead is the only way I combat such emotions.

“UNH is the kid that keeps bleeding and it is starting to draw serious attention from investors. A blue chip of this caliber, generating ~$25B in annual FCF, will certainly gather itself once the dust settles. This trade will take longer than I thought, as there is a completely new story unfolding here. We will be forced to stomach the DOJ process and all the potential headlines that will come from it. I’m confident in this trade based on a few aspects, 1.) The CEO is perfect for this turnaround project 2.) This is a DHQ stock 3.) there is a looming buyback program that can be released at any point 4.) my entry price. While we didn’t expect it to become a long term swing trade, I’m okay with holding this discarded name and watching the story play out. Currently trading at a P/FCF ratio below 9x, UNH has rarely ever been this cheap.”

*UNH stock at market close on September 9th, 2025

From the beginning of August till market close on 9/9, UNH has performed incredibly strong. Being that our average was around $275/share, we have reaped a handsome profit of over 25%. I've started to trim this position and I'll most likely move it to a size where I leave a portion for the long term. I do not typically do this for trades but this is a quality stock so I'm interested in the continued upside here.

EOSE - This is a holding that has my blood pumping recently and for good reasons. We first recommended this company on January 21st, 2025 and have mentioned it numerous times since. We purchased shares around $5.50, $4, and then again recently at $6.50. There is a lot of volatility in this name and we are keeping a close eye on this chart.

*EOSE stock on September 10th

From the visual, we can see a clear Stage 2 phase forming and we are watching to make sure the price stays in that trend. This is why I say we could wake up and the stock be <$5/share. We have planned for these drops to happen much like they did in May when the stock went from $7.33 to $3.72 in a matter of days. We were there to add to our position around $4/share because we anticipated that possibility.

Now I'm not saying this name is going to give us another opportunity in that range because in recent weeks this stock has traded extremely strong. I believe this name is still primed to run up to $10+ this year and that could end up being a very very conservative perspective. When this stock runs, it will be because of a notable press release and will be a very explosive move.

SNDK - This is one of those investments that you look back on and laugh at how you didn't buy more initially. We recommended the name for a few months or so before the stock appreciated over 78%. We were fully allocated around $46/share and exited our full position at $61/share. This is where I take time to review every trade regardless of profit. I had a mental block with my upside target of $60 and once that figure hit I quickly exited. The stock went to $72 the next day. Similarly, I did the same thing on NBIS... securing what I thought was a great profit only to see the stock appreciate over 50% just this week. I make mistakes daily but I will never miss an opportunity to go through the mental exercise of reviewing. You now see names like CRWV and CORZ all rallying off the NBIS deal announcement. This entire sector is red hot and I should've been better at feeling that out. When you find yourself in names that are leading the market, it's extremely tough to fight the current and not sell too early.

Now as to the overall market, the bull is still running but with a different set of names. The anticipation of a September rate cut is certainly accounted for. This market is also being bolstered by the modern AI programs and it's why you see a move like we saw this morning with ORCL appreciating over 40%. For people outside this ecosystem, a move like that is INSANE and must be taken seriously. For those who aren't familiar with Larry Ellison, I highly recommend reading the book, "The Difference between God and Larry Ellison: Inside Oracle Corp" by Mike Wilson. I've hyperlinked it here for those interested readers.

As we continue to run into year end, I urge investors to realize the momentum around their holdings and to take advantage of a strong trading environment. There are a few names I'm not currently invested in that are on my mind and those being EBAY and JD. I'm sure I'll be providing commentary on my actions around those names in due time.

Thank you and Geaux Tigers!
