Though I've not written weekly since August 8th, much of what I wrote this summer remains a priority.

"I lean to the side that we continue this train ride into mid-late August with a possible shake off during September and into October, at which point we will resume the manic bull run into year end."

I continue to be an optimist in that we have not seen this year's market highs and will do so in the fourth quarter. I will be looking and feeling for this during September in anticipation that we resume a manic-ish run once the current trading range is left. NVDA remains atop the crowd, appreciating over 50% from March and even more from the April tariff saga bottom. Those are unprecedented market cap gains for an already multi-trillion dollar company. Another leading name, Google, reported blowout earnings this week that has bolstered the market respectively, another win for the AI crowd. I'll continue to watch the leaders of the AI trend as a foretelling to the overall market. When we experience a tumble, the notorious AI names will see the sharpest pullbacks. By notorious I do not mean NVDA and Google, I'm referring to the lesser quality names in the space, particularly those saddled with debt. It is good practice to make short lists of these names in preparation.

A name I've written about a lot this year that continues to show strength is EOSE. This name is benefiting from the current market themes and has traded strongly all year amid a massive short interest. I've recently added substantially to my EOSE position in the last week or so when it traded around $6.50/share. My original position started in January above $5/share, and another purchase in the $4/share range a month or so after. Currently trading around $8/share, these purchases have appreciated handsomely. This is a name I fully intend on seeing $10+ towards the end of the year with almost no resistance above.

"Lastly, I've been watching EOSE for a potential investment. This one is similar to NGVC in that you can add it to a longer term account or swing trade it. I will personally be doing both. Around $5.50/share this one is very intriguing. You need to expect extreme volatility on this one. We could wake up and it might gap down 15% or gap up 100%. We understand this probability prior to investing, and accordingly manage our risk/reward profile. I think if one enters around $5.50/share, they stand the chance of making a wonderful return."

There is a new position I want to make note of that I started in August from the natural gas sector, this being Comstock Resources (CRK). Yes, this is Jerry Jones' company and he's lost about $2B+ in a matter of months from the share price pulling back. I've initiated this position around $15.50/share and will be looking to trade this back north of $20/share. There is a notable degree of correlation with this name and natural gas prices. At $2.75/MMBtu, I was happy to start my position in CRK. Natural gas has since traded back north of $3/MMBtu with eyes on $3.5/MMBtu.

To summarize a few other notable positions, I maintain a decent position in SNDK. Originally entering around $42/share, I have not added to this position since $47/share. I most likely will not add any more as I expect this extremely undervalued stock to see $60/share in the short term. This is a company with nearly $8B in revenues trading at a $7B market cap. I repeat, extremely undervalued.

Similarly, I'm still allocated to TEM at roughly 5% of my total portfolio. My average is around $58/share and I expect this one to continue to trade strongly through year end. This is a wonderful long term candidate as well. I have positions in tradeable accounts as well as long term retirement accounts.

I maintain a position in VG both in a swing trading account and a long term retirement account. I don't care what this stock does, my entry is my safety net and I'll add more should we see $10/share again. We understand this one is a long term game and all that's going to move the stock near term is press releases. For now, it's a waiting game.

Lastly, as long as my darling NGVC stays around or below $40/share, I'll continue to add to my largest position. This is a long term hold for me and I'm more than happy to wait. We've talked on end about this name for a year now and during the summer it contributed to us giving back some gains. We anticipate a massive quarter in the future where this position leads us past the SP500 benchmark once again. At prices currently below $40/share, we will laugh one day at this offering. This name continues to be a stellar growth story.
